

Chairman's message

As May rolls in, we are reminded of the enduring values of kindness, love and empathy as we celebrate the birthdays of Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore and Gautama Buddha.

Their philosophies stand on the foundation of love and kindness towards fellow beings as well as Mother Nature, freeing individuals from narrow dogmas.

Both of them have emphasized on the importance of 'karuna' or kindness and compassion, as an indispensable quality for leading a better life. It is through kindness that one can seek to alleviate human suffering and protect people from pain. It is through the magic wand of compassion that we can resist all forms of hatred.

We can go a long way in demonstrating compassion by empathizing with others and considering how we can help them. Small gestures, such as a smile or a thank-you note, can make a significant difference in someone's day. Being attentive and present with friends and colleagues is another effective method of showing compassion. Lastly, taking care of our own health and well-being is crucial, as it enables us to assist others when they require it.

Research has indicated that love and compassion have a positive impact not just on the recipients, but also on the practitioners themselves. Practising compassion not only boosts our well-being and happiness, but also cultivates stronger relationships and builds communities. Ultimately, when compassion becomes a way of life, it contributes to fostering world peace.

Love and compassion are often intertwined, as compassion can be seen as an expression of love in action. And our revered poet has beautifully captured the profound transformative power of this universal force...

“Love is not a mere sentiment. It is the ultimate truth at the heart of creation.”
